Community Webs: Empowering Public Librarians to Create Community History Web Archives

Hoan-Vu Do

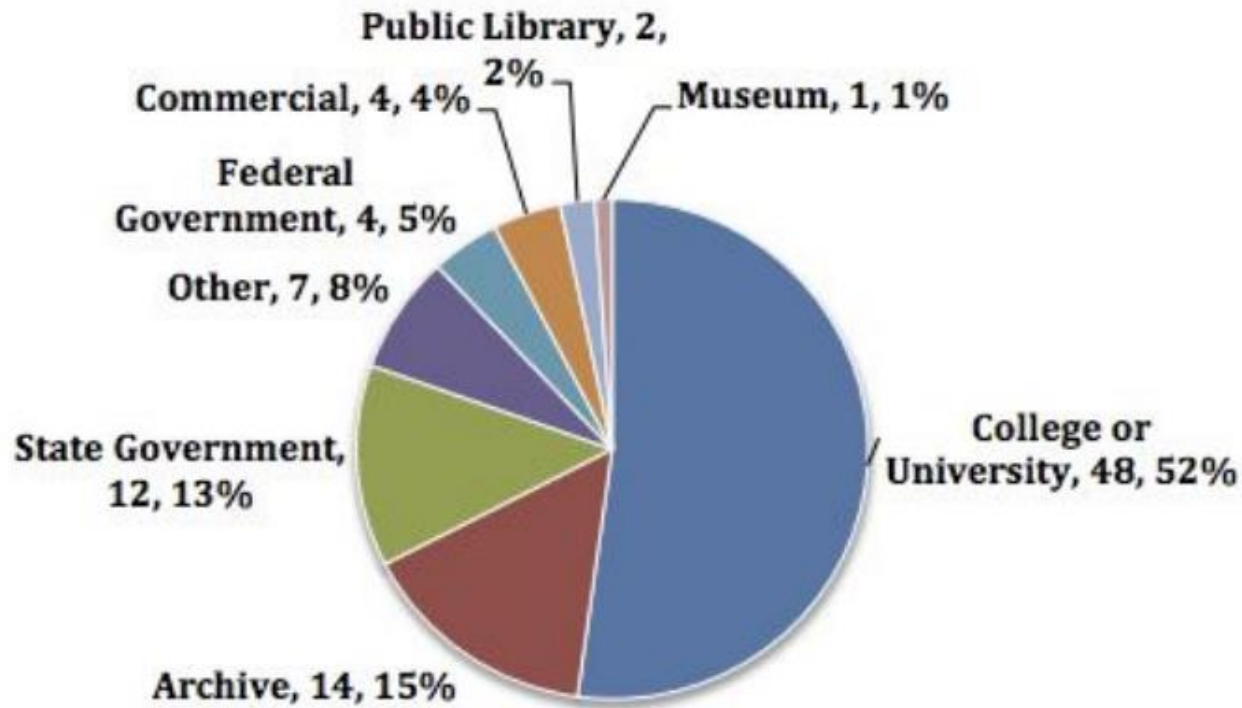

Why is web archiving important?

- Web archiving is the process of collecting, preserving, and ensuring access to online content.
- A typical web page last about 92 days before changing, moving, or going offline.
- The web is now well established as the medium of record for a plethora of information.
- The web is also a source of many types of historical records that have no equivalent in analog form.

Web Archiving in Public Libraries

2014 NDSA Survey results: 2% from Public Libraries

Many public libraries have long histories of collecting analog materials documenting their region. What happens now that these are now increasingly published exclusively online?

Internet Archive

Education & Training

- Establish a cohort network of public librarians doing web archiving to preserve local history
- Support further cohort building, professional development activities, and outreach

Collection Development

- Create open, dedicated training and OER materials on community memory web archiving
- Seed innovative local programming and partnerships

Expanding National Capacity

- Provide web archiving services and infrastructure and ongoing storage and access
- Build an extensible program model that can be scaled and applied to other domains

Challenges on the web

Most content captures very easily, but some exceptions include:

- Dynamic text and images
- Maps that zoom in and out
- Media that requires clicking a “play” button
- Dynamic navigation menu
- Databases

Challenging formats

- Video
- Social media
- Interactive media
- Blogs
- Audio

Collection Development

Outreach

- Solicit content recommendations
- Promote archive as a community resource
